Honors Course Philosophy

Honors courses engage students in every aspect of the learning process, fostering participatory learning through an interchange of ideas among peers and between the students and faculty. Honors courses enrich the university experience of motivated and academically inquisitive students through intellectually challenging experiences that go beyond basic requirements of good pedagogical practices. Honors courses aim to foster student interaction with outstanding faculty, and to instruct students in all stages of the research or creative process. Classes cultivate critical thinking, independent analysis of course material, and skill in self-expression, communication, and critical writing. The topics and subject matter of Honors courses are often more challenging and students are encouraged to explore content in greater depth and detail in order to develop their capacity for independent and creative work. Honors students are expected to be active participants in their learning, to develop an awareness of current research, and to gain knowledge of technical and methodological advances in different disciplines.

Submit completed application and Add/Drop Form to Honors Program Office (B141) one month before the start of classes.

University Honors Program Criteria for Adapting a 300-level Course for Honors Credit

Course Requirements for Honors Electives

Upper division Honors students take nine 300-level credits in their major/minor field as Honors Electives or “adapted courses.” These are regular 300-level courses for which the student executes a “learning contract” with the instructor to enumerate specific requirements to complete the course. These additional requirements must be of sufficient excellence and quality to justify awarding Honors credit.

Simply adding an extra paper, report, or book is usually not sufficient to raise the level of the regular class to the Honors level. While quantitative additions may be necessary, it is the higher degree of sophistication and complexity that distinguishes Honors adapted courses. Honors courses and projects enable broader, deeper, and more complex learning. Such courses are student-driven and faculty-supported. Honors classes cultivate critical thinking, independent analysis of course material, and skill in self-expression, communication, and critical writing. A course that does not challenge and stimulate shortchanges the student and undermines the credibility of the University Honors Program.

Honors-level work means a qualitatively different kind of work, not just more work. Honors students learn at a more rapid pace and to a broader extent, so they can be asked to analyze academic content at a greater depth and from a more mature intellectual perspective. They should be asked to synthesize information they have learned and to present it in new forms and formats as a demonstration of their mastery. Honors students are also invited to make connections among ideas, practices, and approaches within and outside their primary field of interest, as well as evaluate ideas and arguments, including defending and justifying these. Honors work is student-driven and faculty-supported, enabling students to have a more research/creative educational experience while taking a leadership role in their education.

These kinds of requirements are ideally reflected in the learning contract that is negotiated between the instructor and the student (see p. 2 of the Adapted Course Form). The learning contract asks for detailed, specific elements which will differentiate the Honors course from the regular requirements. It is the instructor who should establish what these criteria are and who elaborates to the student how they can be met.

Adapting a 300-level course to an honors course commonly includes one (or more) of the following:

- Include a focused research/creative process component (consistent with the discipline), e.g.:
 - Develop a research design
 - Collect and/or analyze data
 - Work with the faculty member on their research project
 - Conduct library research/literature review
 - Do a performance
 - Write program notes
 - Do a case study
- Expand the depth or breadth of course topics, such as:
 - Synthesize materials to make interdisciplinary connections
 - Design and/or conduct an applied project in the community
 - Engage the community with a project that addresses local and/or global real-world problems
 - Write an expanded research paper to more deeply explore a topic of interest to the student
- Modify the course as writing-intensive
- Institute a student oral presentation or lecture of their work
- Student-led seminar discussion and/or presentation

Honors projects can involve research writing, data analysis, experimentation, interpretation, design, or artistic production. An Honors project may be self-reflective, analytical, or creative. While there is no fixed-point value attached to these requirements, the product a student creates as the Honors component in an adapted course should be worth about one third of the whole course grade.

Note: When students and faculty agree to an adapted course, NEIU creates a new course section for the student. For example, BIO 318 becomes ZBIO 318 for the Honors student. This change in NEIU's Banner system results in the Honors student being dropped from the BIO 318 section and added to the ZBIO 318 section. This change also results in a new D2L course shell being created for ZBIO 318 and the Honors student being removed from the BIO 318 D2L course shell. Please note that this process is automatic and no material or content is lost. The CTL works with Honors to identify the newly-created sections as soon as possible to be ready to combine the newly created Honors D2L course shell with the original course shell. This combining step cannot occur until D2L has the information from Banner, which may result in a brief lag in students' D2L access. Please contact ctl@neiu.edu with questions.
